Transformative therapy provides the opportunity to experience the inevitable rupture and repair constitutive of human relationships AND to observe, reflect on, and more deeply experience and embrace this process. Supervising transformative therapy is intense. Both supervisee and supervisor are impacted. Parallel processes abound. The potential for growth and destruction contained within each moment of both therapy AND supervision is an enlivening responsibility to bear together with our supervisees, often accompanied by feelings of fear, excitement, and overwhelm. At these times, supervisor and/or supervisee may fear that something has gone wrong that must be 'fixed' rather than recognising that an enlivening edge has been reached that can provide the supervisor/supervisee and therapist/patient with an invaluable opportunity to deepen and expand relational experience.

By the end of the Masterclass, participants will be:

- Able to name the key tenets of relational practice
- Familiar with the evidence supporting the science of relational practice
- Confident in identifying how the relationship can be used in supervision and therapy (the art of relational practice)
- Able to identify how a relational dynamic between a supervisee and patient can be repeated in a parallel process that occurs between a supervisor and supervisee
- Acquainted with techniques and clinical examples of:
 - how to tune into what is happening for you during a supervision session (working from the inside)
 - how to use what is happening for you during a supervision session to deepen and expand a supervisee's therapy (working from the inside out)
- Clear about how to incorporate this learning into their current supervisory practice
